The question of Emigration had engaged the attention of economists and statesmen long before the famine of 1846-47. Already as early as the year 1835 a Parliamentary Commission stated that in Ireland there were 2,380,000 persons liable to die of hunger. As the country was periodically visited by famine, it was only natural to inquire whether a service would not be rendered to humanity by multiplying the means of emigration, and meanwhile thousands of the unfortunate inhabitants, weary of a struggle against irremediable misery and interminable oppression, had already solved the question for themselves by fleeing their unhappy-country, to find a new home, and found a greater, more prosperous, and more powerful Ireland beyond the Atlantic. During the fifteen years which preceded the famine...
