Causes of defects in the work should be of value, as it is common practice for many workmen to injure the concrete in the manner outlined. In addition to the general rules of construction, the simple metal form for securing expansion joints and holding the side forms will be invaluable, as well as the machine for molding curb and gutter. The reader cannot but agree with me that often the very simplest methods and materials secure the greatest success, as will be proven by the simple and easily made strap-iron forms to mold diamond, hexagonal, octagonal, and other forms of mosaic floor tile and blocks. This simple mold is also available to mold any form as a separate unit, thus permitting the worker to mold the floor, sidewalk, or porch floor finish in the shop, and laying same when finished and fully cured. This enables the curing of the tile to be more perfectly done than when laid directly upon the floor surface. The construction of reinforced, hollow concrete floor slabs, as fully illustrated and explained, enables the worker to perfect damp-proof floors, no matter where laid. This is an invaluable feature for residence floors and for such structures where perishable articles are to be stored. The subjects of interlocking floor units and the reinforcement of floors and walks is also fully treated, in as complete a manner as it is possible to give in a book of this size. Every effort...
